DID YOU KNOW: Originally the Malay are a sea-faring people. Malay food is strong, spicy and aromatic, combining the rich tastes of the many herbs and spices commonly found in Southeast Asia. Food preparation and eating are communal affairs among the Malays. During a typical Malay lunch or dinner, these dishes are placed in the center of the table to be shared by all the diners. Malay food is often eaten with the hands. It is an art to keep the rice from escaping through the fingers, but with some practice, it can be mastered. Malacca, was one of the great trading centers of the spice trade in the 15th century. Therefore dried spices forms an important component in Malay cooking. With so many different influences from around the region, Malay cuisine has become an interesting and varied adventure, something that can be savored and enjoyed with family and friends.
